GOLF TIP... Wind Cheater

Question: Why do I often hit wayward shots into wind – especially ones that fall short of my target – even though I take more club than normal?

Answer: Inaccurate shots stem from poor thinking and a misunderstanding of how to tackle a headwind. Too often a golfer feels he must hit the ball harder to counter the effect of the wind. This is the worst possible approach if you want to keep the ball under control.

Trying to hit the ball hard with a full and forceful swing means you strike down firmly which creates a lot of backspin. The ball rises quickly, and the effect of the headwind makes the ball climb higher and balloon. The shot is held on the air and falls short of the target. Because the ball flies high, it can also be easily blown off line in a slight crosswind.

Low under the breeze

To hit accurate shots in a headwind, it's essential to swing with a smooth, easy and controlled action. The key to command into wind is keeping the ball low and on a penetrative trajectory.

To hit the wind cheater, play the ball from slightly further back in your stance and choose more club than usual. The secret to hitting this shot correctly is to keep the backswing shorter than normal and to swing down with slightly less wrist action. This naturally creates a sweeping arc rather than steep downward attack.

The combination of the club, ball position and smooth, slow, sweeping swing keeps the ball low. To gain extra control it helps to choke down a little on the club – which also naturally reduces wrist action.
