TIP FROM THYS...

Hooking help

Hooking doesn't have to be a result of an in-to-out swing path. It can also be caused by poor wrist action – perhaps bad positioning or excessive use. A wrong top of backswing position or a whippy action can close the clubface at impact – a sure route to a hook.

Question: I feel as though I'm swinging on the correct plane and path but still hit the occasional hook. What could I be doing wrong?

Answer: If you're not swinging from in to out, the only other way to hit a hook is to have a closed clubface at impact. You're almost certain to return the clubface closed if your blade is hut at the top of your backswing. If you have an arched wrist at the top – even if your club points parallel to the target line – the blade is shut. From here you naturally swing down and strike the ball with a closed clubface – unless you make drastic changes in your wrist position. The ball starts straight – as you attack it on the correct in-to-in path – but then curves left.

Flat wristed

To avoid a closed blade attack, your wrist has to be positioned correctly at the top of the backswing. The back of your left hand and your forearm must form a straight line for the blade to be square at the top. From this position you have a great chance of returning the blade square at impact.

NOTE:

M.L.R. L-2 making the player responsible for entering handicap on the scorecard.

Contrary to the new 2023 rules of golf 3.3b(4) that states that the player will not be responsible for putting their handicap on the scorecard, GOLFRSA has introduced M.L.R. L-2 which places the responsibility back with the player (failure to do so results in DQ from competition).

This a new local rule at KRGC.
