Tip from Thys...

Mid-range muddles

The awkward length bunker shot – 30–60y (27-55m) is one of the trickiest of all to judge. Poor striking and gauging of distance are common faults, but they can be eliminated with confidence and the correct technique.

QUESTION: I swing fully to try to power the ball out of sand and reach the target, but my shots nearly always fall short. Why?

ANSWER: Taking too much sand is the most common reason for shots out of a mid-range bunker landing short of the target. The main cause of this is using your normal greenside bunker technique. Aligning too far left and opening up the blade creates an out-in-swing path, and you naturally hit behind the ball and take sand with the shot. This action combined with your usual follow through – holding the blade square for as long as possible – floats the ball out softly. It is almost impossible to hit a ball 40yd (36cm) if you use this greenside method.

Square and clean

Play these tricky mid-rangers like you would a normal pitch shot from the fairway. Align and aim square and try to pick the ball crisply and cleanly off the sand. This alignment helps to promote an in-to-in swing path and a full release through the ball – both useful if you need to gain distance.
