TIP FROM THYS...

Tormenting shank...

Shanking is the most destructive and mentally damaging of all golfing afflictions. After making a seemingly decent swing you shoot the ball violently right. But you can take away the fear of the shot with careful preparation and a controlled swing.

Question: When I try to hit a high lob shot over trouble, I often shank. Why?

Answer: Even though you understand the technique needed to play the cut-up shot, you overdo the set-up. You feel that you need to create as much loft on the clubface as possible and so align way left of the target while keeping the blade square.

Because you swing along the line of your feet, the clubhead path is severely out to in. This means that you lead into impact with the hosel of the club. If you are lucky you strike the ball with the face, but you are more likely to catch it with the neck of the club first - hence the shank.

Subtle set-up

For the cut-up shot to come off you do need to set up aligning left of target with your blade square, but the change should not be too drastic. The sand wedge is naturally designed to loft the ball high, so you only need to open your stance a little. When you square the blade, make sure that you can swing into impact from an outside line without the hosel leading the attack. A few small practice swings should give you a good idea whether the clubface can contact the ball first. Then swing smoothly and be confident that, the blade will do its work – thinking you might shank never helps.

Just joking...

How is golf like fishing? Both mysteriously encourage exaggeration.

And finally...
