How to Hit Irons Pure: Tips to hitting your irons consistently

The pure iron shot is one of the best feelings in golf. When you strike an iron perfectly, there's not many better feelings in golf.

5 Proven Tips for Hitting Pure Iron Shots Every Time

1. Ball Position

Ball position is one of the more overlooked areas of the setup for amateur players. The ball position has a big impact on your strike position.

- If your irons are too far back in your stance, when you get to the ball, you may hit behind it, and the clubface could be open as it still didn't have time to close.

- If your irons are too far forward in your stance, you may hit them thin, lose power, or even hook them to the left.

2. Take the Divot After Impact

When hitting a pure iron shot, a divot comes after the golf ball. If a divot is before the ball, the strike is not considered to be pure.

One of my favourite drills to help improve your angle of attack and hit down and through iron shots involves using a tee placed directly in front of the ball.

Place the tee in front of the golf ball so that it is loose on the ground. In other words, don't put the tee into the ground. Instead, just put it about a ½ inch in front of your golf ball (where the divot should be).

Now, take some swings without changing your ball position. On these shots, teach yourself to hit the ball and the tee to achieve that divot after the golf ball.

3. Leave the Face Square at Setup

Did you know that some golfers set themselves up for a poor iron shot before they even take the club back?

When hitting a pure iron shot, the clubface should be square. When did you last check your setup to ensure the clubface was square and aligned toward the target?

4. Play Your Natural Shot Shape

If you naturally fade or draw the ball, play it! There is no reason to fight the natural shot shape; simply learn to play with it.

When you stop fighting what is natural, hitting a golf shot with more speed and confidence becomes easier. If your natural shot shape is a hook or a slice, work on straightening the clubface at impact a bit so you are dealing with a draw or a fade.

5. Control the Speed on the Backswing

Tempo is often considered one of the more important features of any golf swing. However, most golfers struggle to think about the overall tempo, so they try simply controlling the backswing speed.

If you tend to take the club back quickly, you may make slight errors that decrease your consistency at impact.

Taking the golf iron back a little slower will help keep you on plane, maintain proper wrist angles, allow for weight transfer, and improve overall tempo.
